We are grateful to Marian Bisanz-Prakken for examining this work in the original and for her help in cataloguing the work.

Gustav Klimt's painting, first exhibited in 1909 with the title "Judith", is generally referred to today as "Judith II" (to distinguish it from his "Judith I" painted in 1901), but is also often titled "Salome". The protagonist is associated with the latter femme fatale primarily because of the flowing veils, which seem to allude to Salome's famous veil dance.

Klimt's graphic exploration of this female figure - whoever may be meant - took place away from the mixture of decadence and madness that characterizes the oil painting. The studies drawn around 1908 are self-contained and are partly linked to the dance theme of Salome, but also to the drawings of female dancers that Klimt had created shortly before for the figure of "Expectation" in the Stoclet frieze.

This very cultivated study of - according to Erich Lederer - Klimt's most beautiful model, which also appears in the painting, is described by Alice Strobl as a work "whose richness of line, colors and heightening of white make it one of the main works of Klimt's mature drawing style and in this area offers an equivalent to the painting 'Kiss'."

Indeed, Klimt seems to have found the perfect balance between confident lightness and formal discipline in this casually posing seated figure, whose facial expressions suggest a hint of decadence. This masterpiece is further distinguished by an exceptional degree of linear differentiation.

We are grateful to Marian Bisanz-Prakken for examining this work in the original and her help in cataloguing the work.

Klimt's oil painting "Wasserschlangen II" (Water Snakes II) is one of the artist's works in which naked, erotically playful underwater creatures evoke a mysterious fantasy world. It was first shown at the Secession in 1904, but in the years that followed, Klimt revised this first version of the painting giving it the final solution we know today in 1907. What the original version looked like can only be guessed from contemporary descriptions; more detailed insights have been revealed by recent examinations of the painting in the Belvedere in Vienna.

The present sheet was created in the context of the first version and anticipates the lower, prone nude figure at the bottom of the second one in several respects. Nevertheless, the model of the drawing appears much more fragile and slender than the painted figure in the final version. Stylistically, this work is anchored in the pioneering period of Klimt's pencil technique, in which the highly refined, metallic sharp lines seem to correspond congenially to the earliest paintings of his "Golden Style".

The present drawing is one of the most beautiful examples of the many studies, also drawn in 1904, in which the models stretched out parallel to the picture plane convey the impression of an endless flow. The textiles here look like water, and the upper outline of the body, accentuated by hatching, is also reminiscent of a wave. Klimt achieves a special effect – similar to the painting – through the darkly framed eyes.

We are grateful to Dr. Marian Bisanz-Prakken for examining this work in the original and for her help in cataloguing the work.

As a unique draughtsman of the human figure, Gustav Klimt moved between two poles in all phases of his work. On the one hand, it was very important to him to subordinate the poses and gestures of the sitters to an invisible geometric structure. On the other hand, he strove to capture the sensual appearance of those posing for him as concise as possible by means of accurate outlines.

In the present drawing, created in 1912/13 and not connected to any particular painting, Klimt seems to have intentionally taken these poles to the extreme. The sheet, executed in blue colored pencil and enlivened by red accents, shows a model bent forward, whose bare buttocks facing us dominate the depiction together with her thighs. Amidst the swirl of wildly patterned pieces of fabric, this powerful, strongly outlined body part stands out all the more.

At the same time, the thighs, positioned at right angles, reveal the naked sex (possibly as a reference to the mysterious origin of human life). In this ecstatic line work, bold eroticism and extreme geometric discipline meet in an incomparable way.

Essen, Museum Folkwang 1976, Gustav Klimt. Zeichnungen aus Albertina und Privatbesitz, 30 January – 14 March 1976, cat. no. 50, ill. in color

We are grateful to Marian Bisanz-Prakken for examining this work in the original and for her help in cataloguing the work.

The drawing of a model lying on her side, half facing the viewer, belongs to a large group of studies that accompany Klimt's production of the second version of the painting "Wasserschlangen II" (Water Snakes II), completed in 1907 (see cat. no. 2). These sheets, which Alice Strobl dates to around 1905/06, often go far beyond the painted figures and appear as autonomous works due to their self-contained character.

Just as in the 1904 studies for the first version of the painting, the theme of the endless flow is explored in numerous variations. The horizontal paper format dominates, with the outstretched reclining figures indulging in their dreamy, often erotic moods. As a draughtsman, Klimt also ventured into taboo subjects such as same-sex love or masturbation in this context.

In contrast, the nude figure shown here, drawn in red pencil, is characterized by an expression of inner withdrawal or a state of sleep; the closed eye and the slightly open mouth allow both interpretations. The lean, slightly raised body seems to be carried by a wave - an impression that is reinforced by the ripples in the cloth under her body. Instead of the meticulously sharp lines of the works drawn in 1904, softer outlined forms appear here, with the red color adding an element of warmth and life.

Watercolor, applied in soft, limpid pools, remains the chief coloring medium of Egon Schiele in 1912. It is the year when he was imprisoned in April but was also on subsequent travels to Trieste in May, Lake Constance (Bodensee) in August and Győr in December (cf. Kallir, 1990, p. 308). Similar to the oil landscapes the horizontal tendency is evident in this delicate watercolor portrait of houses, obviously a quick sketch, taken out of an impulse.

The German title hints at the possible topographical location: “Houses in front of vineyard terraces” is reminiscent of the views of the small town Stein an der Donau in the Wachau, captured by Schiele in several oil paintings in 1913. The church tower is omitted in the watercolor study, as the artist was more interested in the rhythmic arrangement of the three house façades with their different window surrounds and the roofscape behind.

The appeal of this sheet lies precisely in its incompleteness; it is a sketch that allows the viewer to trace the painter’s evolving ideas and images.

1918 was a very productive and creative year but also Egon Schiele's last one before he died in October. A strive for greater simplicity, capturing his subject with the barest minimum of line dominates most of these last drawings as well as an investigating but somehow also distant interest in female sexuality (cf. Kallir, 1990, p. 602).

Thus, this drawing of a pair of lesbian models illustrates less an erotic action, much more a fascinating and complex interaction of lines, starting with soft waves and culminating in a rollercoaster of fluent, modelling and powerful black strokes. The arms of the two women intertwine, but while one lays her head on her friend's chest, the other looks dreamily into the distance without noticing the viewer.

We are grateful to Dr. Cornelia Cabuk and Dr. Franz Smola, Belvedere for confirming the authenticity of this work and for the inclusion in the catalog raisonné under the no. GE 284 A.

The title of the painting – Riva Schiavoni - is somewhat misleading, as the most famous waterside promenade in the world is only identifiable in this light drunken painting by the great building of the Chiesa della Pietà seen in the distance. Carl Moll, who sojourned in Venice for several months in the years 1907, 1913 and 1922, may have been standing on the jetty of the Hotel Monaco, following the flow of the water, which, like a street lined with sailing boats, extends deep into the picture, past the Giardini Reali, and the Doge's Palace, down to the sun-drenched buildings along the Riva. It is wonderful to see how the shape of the boats and the white gleaming balustrades are mirrored in the gentle swell of the water, how the warm sunlight adds a yellowish rinse to the delicate strands of cloud and lends a golden glow to the buildings.

Egon Schiele was in the same barracks in Mühling, Lower Austria, as Lt. Fekete, whom he drew on July 16, 1916. (Nebehay, Egon Schiele. 1890–1918, Life, Letters, Poems, Salzburg, Vienna 1979, no. 1057.)

From May 1916, Egon Schiele served as a soldier in the provisions office of the Mühling prisoner-of-war camp near Wieselburg in Lower Austria. This change in his circumstances prompted him to focus his attention on the portraits of his army superiors and comrades. They first exude the detached professionalism apparent in many of the later commissions. (cf. Kallir, 1990, p. 560)

Schiele places the portrait of the Hungarian lieutenant in the center of the large sheet. The emptiness draws attention to the bright, somewhat squinting eyes under long eyelashes. The painter captures the moustache and forehead hair in almost ornamental quick lines, emphasizing youth, beauty and a charming uncertainty.

Max Oppenheimer (MOPP) was a passionate chess player and loved the atmosphere in the cafés when the battle of wits took place at the board. The game of chess therefore also accompanied him artistically in the most diverse periods of his work, in ever-changing combinations and image sections. (cf. Marie-Agnes von Puttkamer, Max Oppenheimer. 1885–1954, Vienna 1999, cat. rais. no. 107 (1916), no. 212 (1931), no. 265 (1939), as well as in: Max Oppenheimer. Expressionist pioneer, Leopold Museum, Vienna 2023, ill. p. 272

This painting is a new discovery and according to family tradition a gift in lieu of payment for a Viennese dentist who was also a chess player. Oppenheimer lived in Vienna again from 1932 to 1938, and the present work can also be stylistically dated to these years.

In 1935, Max Oppenheimer was given the opportunity to exhibit at the Vienna Secession. Two chess games are mentioned in the catalog under nos. 16 and 19, but without an illustration or precise picture details (cf. Puttkamer, nos. 212 and 248). It is therefore not possible to identify this painting as one of them, but the exhibition shows Oppenheimer's enduring interest in chess as a pictorial motif.

The focus of the composition is on the moment of the move, which is of decisive importance given the small number of pieces on the board. The extreme close-up view of the board alone heightens the tension, elevating the hands with their delicate but "speaking" fingers – so characteristic of Oppenheimer – to the status of the actual players. Similar to the first known version from 1916, only the profile of one player can be seen, tensely observing his opponent's decision, while the match has gone out without lighting the cigarette.

In the late Twenties and Thirties, the paintings “Holzknechte” (1926/27), “Frühling in Tirol” (1928), “Einsame Hausung” (circa 1930), “Almen und Firn” (1933), and “Bergweiler (Weiler in Tirol)” (1935) represented the impasto-painted conception of village and alpine ambience. The titles of these works are now directly associated with the term ‘Tyrol’. Soft hilltops and hollows stand in contrast to rocky, rugged mountain backdrops... It is only in the later village views that the scenery is assembled like a stage set, with no reference to reality, in which people perform the role of extras. And yet these subjects reflect the elemental power of new motifs...

Strong demand led to repetition. The motifs were created with slight variations, but always showed his mastery of painting technique and colour...

“Only nature remains as a model”

Alfons Walde 1925

This large-format version of the rare motif of the “Einsame Hausung” (Lonely dwelling) from the mid-1930s captivates above all with the density of the impasto color modulations and the force of the tectonic paint application. At the same time, the painterly execution emphasizes the theme of the lonely farmhouse set against the steep face of a nearby mountain, the drama of which is heightened by the extreme close-up view of the composition. As is typical for Walde, the red splashes of color in the balcony flowers and the staffage figure of the mother and child add a narrative but also rhythmically pulsating component (cf. Gert Ammann, 1976, S. 16).

“All emphasize is placed on making the outline as expressive as possible and to show with pure, raw, unmodulated colors the picture as original in its effects as these people in life.”

Heinrich Hammer, 1921, cited in Amman, 2001, p. 56

Alfons Walde, who chose to live in Kitzbühel rather than Vienna after the war, drew his artistic inspiration from the familiar surroundings of the mountains and a strong, vibrant folk culture. In the early 1920s, genre scenes dominated, which he took from everyday village life, but gave them a timelessly valid expression with his own pictorial language that emphasized the large form.

A strikingly modeling brushstroke determines this entertaining scene of peasants in the pub, who await the cool beer with palpable joy. A lively rhythm of green, red and white tones underlines the cheerfulness of the scene and lends the almost archaic, monumental depiction a humorously decorative note.

“I stubbornly began painting portraits in order to be able to look people in the eye, to get to know their characteristics, to become familiar with the society in which I now had to live.”

Oskar Kokoschka, 1971

This delicate portrait belongs to a series of vibrantly colored watercolors that Oskar Kokoschka created in Dresden in the early 1920s. He had been appointed professor at the academy there in 1920. His preferred subject in these three years were portraits of girls, whose features he was able to capture in a fascinatingly spontaneous and relaxed style.

“Alfons Walde was the designer of a still unspoiled nature, an unmanipulated image of man a still intact landscape and living space. It may be striking for Walde’s character how much he always clung to his sphere of life and never sought to leave it. In doing so, he succeeded in raising awareness of the living situation far from the big city and in making a contribution to self-discovery that is relevant again today.”

Gerd Ammann, Alfons Walde, Innsbruck 2001

The magnificent backdrop of the Wilder Kaiser with its striking mountain silhouette is one of the unmistakable painterly motifs in Alfons Walde’s work, but as always with him, it is more of a topos, an image brand, than a specific geographical location. It is the typical, the unique idea that is associated with the terms “mountain and farm and idyll” that Walde knows how to convey in large forms. Added to this is the harmony of the colors with the wonderful shades of gray and brown, attractively accentuated by the white of the farmwalls and the red of the flowers.

"The objects form a very special kind of forceps for understanding and grasping reality."

Werner Berg

Intense colors of blue, green and violet contrasting with yellow, red and pink are Werner Berg's preferred colors in his later oeuvre after 1945. Integrated into strict formal boundaries, colors lose their purely expressive character and become a sculptural, symbolic form themselves. In his pictures of flowers in the field, the artist also opted for an extreme close-up view and a perspective that moves from bottom to top.

In this newly discovered painting, this also lends the flowers and as yet unblossomed poppy capsules something monumental and an appealing dialectic between immediacy and distance. The conclusion with a broom covered by a headscarf lends a humorous accent to the already endearing subject matter.

At the age of almost 70, around 1930, Carl Moll embarked on his late oeuvre, a perceptible dynamic and stylistically newly shaped period in his work. In keeping with the Impressionist tradition but with free, broad brushstrokes, he worked with complementary colors of light and dark, always avoiding black. This stylistic shift is also apparent in “The tall poplar”, a pendant to the painting “Summer’s Day” in the Belvedere collection.

A large, shimmering green poplar tree stands majestically on the bank of a pond or watercourse. The painting is a homage to the light. It avoids the monotony of a tonal sequence of the only used colour green by progressing rhythmically and harmoniously from light to dark, additionally creating a sense of vital fluidity with carefully positioned white patches of sky.

Provenance:

Private Collection, South Germany

The protagonist sits on the shore of a lake engrossed in a book, in her white dress, with white stockings and shoes and a light blue striped waistcoat, her Florentine hat decorated with delicate pink flowers beside her on the table. It is a sunny autumn day, and the green and golden-brown leaves of the trees form waves in the wind above her head.

“The depiction of a pretty and lightly dressed woman, a lady [...], was just an opportunity for him to let the play of light and colour take full effect.” (F.v. Ostini, Der Maler Edward Cucuel, Zurich/Vienna/Leipzig 1924, p. 39ff.) The appeal of Edward Cucuel’s paintings lies in their palpable lightness and nonchalant sophistication. The staging of the models blurs the boundary between pose and unobserved spontaneity. Cucuel began his light-filled plein-air painting as early as 1911, spending the summer months in the Chiemgau region and devoting himself to the motifs of bathers and women in nature. He later moved to Lake Starnberg, where he bought a villa with extensive lakeside grounds. The present work was likely created on Lake Starnberg in the 1930s. Cucuel’s paintings allow us to breathe in the golden warmth of summer, the refreshing coolness of the water and the fragrant greenery of the surrounding landscape, giving us a sense of the melancholy elegance of a bygone Belle Epoque. This almost physical immediacy is what makes his works so special.

Auguste Rodin, one of the most famous sculptors, developed a radically new approach to his art. He created structured and naturalistic forms that stand out from the idealized and mythological sculptures of the past.

In the present work, Rodin did not only illustrate the myth of the minotaur in his sculpture, he offered the opportunity of speculation about what may have happened before and could happen after the situation depicted. The figure shows no violent seduction and the nymph has no terrified look or frightened gesture. The minotaur is seated on a rock, staring open-mouthed at the nymph's hair. His left hand is holding her elbow, while with his right hand he embraces her extended right thigh, where it met the left hand of the nymph. Although the nymph is raising her shoulder and with the whole body she is leaning against her left side, it seems, that she has no inclination to rebuff her horned seducer. Her right leg is slung over his, but with her foot pressing against the ground, she seems to avert his embrace. But her right hand is simply lying on her own thigh and her facial expression shows rather a frown than fear. Minotaur is a highly erotic and sexually charged work (Elsen 2003: 510).

Rodin drew inspiration for the creation of the Minotaur, designed between 1883 and 1885, from several sources, particularly Ovid's Metamorphoses, which he greatly admired. Book II, depicting Zeus's transformation into a white bull with golden horns in order to kidnap Europa, as well as Book VIII in which the King of Crete, Minos, delivers seven young men and seven young women to his bull-headed son imprisoned in a labyrinth, are believed to be key references. Several historians also link the Minotaur to Stéphane Mallarmé's poem, L'après-midi d'un faune (1875), as Rodin gave Mallarmé a plaster cast of the Minotaur in 1893.

Initially designed at a height of 33 centimetres, Rodin made a marble sculpture of the Minotaur in May 1903 for the German collector Karl-Ernst Osthaus. As was his custom, Rodin kept several plaster casts of the marble, two of which are now in the Rodin Museum and one of which was given to the journalist and art critic Maurice Guillemot (1859-1931). Among the many letters exchanged between Guillemot and Rodin from 1884 onwards and preserved in the archives of the Rodin Museum, we find mention of a Minotaur, material unspecified, in a letter dated August 1905. It was from this plaster cast in Maurice Guillemot's former collection that a bronze edition was made after 1985, at the Georges Rudier foundry, starting with number 2/8. (Comité Rodin)

Minotaur is one of the sculptures of Rodin often exhibited: it first recorded exhibition was in Munich (1896), thereafter it was shown in Vienna (1898), The Hague (1899), Paris (1900, 1910, 1917), Potsdam (1903), Düsseldorf (1904) and Barcelona (1907). The sculpture was exhibited under different titles like 'Faun and Woman', 'Satyr and Nymph' or 'Jupiter Taurus' (Elsen 2003: 510; Tancock 1976: 270).

Rodin himself preferred the title 'The Minotaur', referring to mythology. After the wedding of Minos and Pasiphaë and her union with a bull, the Minotaur is born. Each year the Athens have to sacrifice him seven maids and seven young men until he is finally beaten by Theseus. With the title 'The Minotaur', the composition of Rodin shows the Minotaur with one of his sacrifice (Tancock 1976: 270).

Hale Asaf

Estimate:

EUR 20,000.- to EUR 30,000.-

European Private Collection

Exhibited:

Paris, Galerie Jeune Europe, 1932 (label on the reverse)

Hale Asaf was born in Istanbul in 1905. As the daughter of high-ranking Ottoman government officials, she enjoyed a wealthy upbringing and a refined education.

She arrived in Rome at only 14 years old, on the outbreak of the Turkish War of Independence. There, she started studying painting, thus beginning her cosmopolitan artistic education which would span the major European capitals: Paris, Berlin, and Munich, where she was a pupil of Lovis Corinth.

But Paris was her heartland. It was here that she moved in 1931, when, bored with provincial life in Bursa, she decided to leave her husband of just three years to devote herself completely to painting.

The Ville Lumière was the scene of Hale Asaf's artistic rebirth. It was here that she embarked on an affair with Antonio Aniante, an Italian intellectual and owner of the Galerie-Librerie Jeune Europe, of which she was soon to become artistic director.

Hale led a bohemian life in the Montparnasse district during these Parisian years, exhibiting her canvases and continuing her artistic research by developing work freely drawn from the painting of Matisse, of whom she was a great admirer:

“Having regained her courage, Hale went back to work (...); avant-garde painter and admirer of Matisse (...). She loved working with paintbrushes as big as dustpans (...).”

(A. Aniante, Memorie di Francia. Il rapisardino arcimiliardario a Montparnasse, G.C. Sansoni 1973, p. 70)

The artistic trajectory of the ‘Capinera del Bosforo’, as she was known, was as brief as her short life; her already precarious state of health plummeted, and she died of cancer aged only 33 and was buried in the Parisian cemetery of Thais.

Antonio Aniante left Paris shortly after Hale Asaf's death: too sad to live there without his beloved.

“I did not resist such profound anguish for long, such desolation, such obstinate presence of memories, of objects and images dear to me; as soon as evening fell (...) as soon as I turned on the light, the flowers, landscapes, birds, waters, skies and seas that the beloved creature painted suddenly appeared before my hallucinating eyes. I got up, filled a suitcase with rags and fled, abandoning everything forever: books, manuscripts, sculptures, everything in the hands of my concierge’. (A. Aniante, Memorie di Francia. Il rapisardino arcimiliardario a Montparnasse, G.C. Sansoni 1973, p. 97–98)

Those of Hale Asaf's works rescued from dispersal and destruction are exhibited in major Turkish museums: Painting and Sculpture Museum, Istanbul; Rezan Has Museum, İstanbul; Istanbul Modern Art Museum, Istanbul; Sakip Sabanci Museum, Istanbul, and at the Painting and Sculpture Museum, Ankara.

Note:

The work takes up a motif painted in Paris at the time of Surrealism, between 1927 and 1928. In this work, the almost 80-year-old painter takes up a theme from his youth with the desire to revive the Hellenistic dream of a temple and a Mediterranean Sea where the energy and vitality of the horse dwells.

Horses are always connected with myth, often combined with a subterranean 'auto-myography'. The novelty is not in the seemingly-obvious invention, or in the composition that is limned by existing silhouettes: it is all in the colour. Brilliant, topical, déco: it plunges these Dionysian presences into the placid sea of Thessaly, against the Parthenon of childhood

M. Fagiolo dell'Arco, P. Baldacci (ed.), Giorgio de Chirico, Parigi 1924–1929, Edizioni Philippe Daverio, Milan, 1982, p. 124

His horses gallop on beaches sprinkled with ruins of small temples, of broken columns. Mythology and archaeology merge in the memory, in the evocation and in the amused play through which the old artist recalls his Greek origins.

We are in the Sixties, the years of Pop Art, whose artistic language and style often merge with play. But it would be wrong to discuss the influence of Pop Art on De Chirico's painting, better to understand how extraordinarily the artist succeeds in tuning in to his own time. The maestro's greatness can be seen in how he understands the climate of modernity and makes it his own, even if perhaps unconsciously, despite obstinately considering himself "an artist out of time". In so doing he has become a master and an example for the paintings of future generations.

We know from Hugo's own account that Courbet once told him: 'I have made a real wall, absolutely real. In making it, I tormented myself as much as Homer could have in describing Achilles' shield and, on my word of honour, my wall is worth his shield, which is greatly lacking'. Only the narcissism of this great man could allow such a comparison, especially as I don't doubt that he was right. Of course I don't want to repeat comparisons now, but just to say that, standing in front of Guttuso's Republican Wall or some of his grandiose fragments of Roman aqueducts, I was reminded of Courbet's torment. Because in these walls that Guttuso has so recently been painting I find not only new torment, new strength, but the spirit of a reality so grounded, powerful and almost aggressive, that they become a paradigm, a signal, a symbol of his entire last pictorial phase; or at least a fundamental part of it.

Giorgio Galansino, Jean Fautrier: A Chronology of his Early Paintings (1921–1942), Thesis, University of Chicago, 1973, no. 76
Marcel André Stalter, Recherche sur l'oeuvre de Jean Fautrier de son commencement à 1940. Essai de catalogue méthodique et d'interprétation, Thesis, Sorbonne University, 1982, no. 237
Marie-José Lefort, Fautrier. Catalogue Raisonné de l'oeuvre peint, Paris 2023, no. 370, p. 248 with col. ill.

From the outset, Fautrier's paintings were shaped by two fundamental questions. One was the technique of painting itself. The other question concerned the series, the creation of images with a common format and motif, in which the figures are reduced to a small number of visual signs. He began with this idea of series as early as the 1920s. His figurative painting was dedicated to traditional genres: still lifes, landscapes, and nudes, leading from a raw realism to a representation consisting of dark light with almost abstract forms. Fautrier's black visions challenge the sharpness of colour. Driven into Goya's dark phantasms in the 19th century, rediscovered by Manet and Malevich, black was recognised in its deepest essence at the beginning of the 20th century, at times transcending mourning and melancholy to become the uplifting and subtle architecture of the two-dimensional canvas: "Le noir est une couleur!" (Matisse). At the end of this period referred to as the 'black period,' Nu stands on the diffuse, enigmatic border between vision and dream, where his body is immersed in seemingly weightless darkness, his silhouette merging with the grey-black background, oscillating between form and content, life and death, eroticisation and decomposition.

"There is nothing clear that does not include a dark part. It would be little; it is nothing clear which is not such according to the obscure part which it contains. I imagine, however, a painting which takes, to begin with, this party of the indefinable and the black spot"

Note:

Duranton claimed to have received this painting from one of Picabia's daughters in around 1933 in exchange for English lessons, but this has not been verified.

(Catalogue Raisonné, Bd. III, 1927–1939, Brussels 2019, p. 270)

Girod lists "Silene" as the common name for the butterfly "Proserpinus proserpina", the crepuscular evening primrose hawk-moth. The body of the butterfly is sage-green, its serrated inner wings glow a delicate yellow-orange. Its name comes from its favourite food: the evening primrose. Its bright yellow flowers open in the evening and they begin to fade the next morning, when the sun shines. The Greek philosopher and natural scientist Theophrastus (372–287 BC), a student of Aristotle, determined the generic name of the evening primrose, but the meaning and historical origin of the plant's name remains largely unknown. In ancient Greece, evening primrose plants were a popular snack that accompanied wine. According to ancient tradition, the evening primrose was able to tame wild animals if moistened with wine.

A distinction must be made here between the individual "Silenos", an old and usually drunken man with comical features who was regarded as Dionysus's tutor, and the Sileni who were part of Dionysus's swarming entourage alongside the nymphs.

Picabia's Silene is composed of three transparent overlapping layers, her head placed proportionally to the unfolding chalice-shaped flower – her gracefully drawn brows and gentle eyes render her perhaps the embodied reincarnation of this connection.

Literature:

L. Cavallo (ed.), Magnelli. Dalla formazione fiorentina all'astrattismo, Brerarte, Milan, 1984, p. 99, no. 38 with ill.

The Florentine artist Magnelli had already confidently embarked on the path of robust, formal monumentality at the point of creating 'Pietre' (Stones). He still, however, had to thoroughly investigate the means, the manner, and the way of achieving this result without falling into the trap of rhetoric and monumentalism.

Once again, the great Tuscan artistic tradition came to his aid: the spatial partitions of Piero della Francesca in the 'Legend of the Cross', the fantastic mountains of the Florentine frescoes and also, albeit to a lesser extent than previously, those of Masaccio. Thus what could have passed as vaguely metaphysical (the timing fits: just think of the contemporary works of Soldati and certain works by Prampolini who, not coincidentally, was an acute reviewer of Magnelli in 1934) instead held the aura of absolute rational construction so typical of the Italian 15th-century Renaissance.

Note:

Pentimenti reveal that this Provençal landscape is painted over a transparence involving two superimposed heads, probably of circa 1936

In the dreamlike tableaux of the transparencies, Picabia referenced visual sources ranging from ancient Rome to the Renaissance, often juxtaposing the sacred with the profane. These works draw on mythology, religion, and conventions of beauty and, in their blending of the unexpected, project a distinctly Surrealist sensibility. As much as they reflect the traditional world, however, they also mirror modern times: indeed, Picabia derived his simultaneous, nonhierarchical use of images from his experiments in film, especially his 1924 masterpiece with René Clair, Entr'acte.

“These transparencies with their corner of oubliettes permit me to express for myself the resemblance of my interior desires ...I want a painting where all my instincts may have a free course.”

"I have been asked on many occasions if I had no interest in people, as it seems I pay too little attention. 'Very much so', I replied, 'perhaps just different than what is common practice.' The eye captures the impression in a twelfth of a second, and further lingering on the object is private amusement. But even when you look at people just halfway, they still become simpler and larger. [...] Laugh, cheer, cry or be happy, you are my pictures and the sound of your voices, the nature of your characters in all diversity, these are my colors."

J. Dupin, A. Lelong-Mainaud (ed.) Joan Miró Drawings: Catalogue Raisonné, Vol. V, Daniel Lelong and Successió Miró Publishers, 2015, p. 355, no. 4217 with ill.

We find traces of imaginary worlds in the works of Joan Miró. Both light-hearted and pensive, the Catalan artist stated that he was inspired by his emotions and that he understood nothing about the theory of art. A melancholy rebel, he considered reality to be an accessory of the imagination, so that all he had around him was reduced to an optional, to be translated into a form extraneous to the referent. One could say that he intended to separate objectivity from mere representation, giving reality the opportunity to generate new and manifold interpretations.

His sometimes cryptic poetics were based on the magic of a style capable of reducing reality to a collection of allusions. Everything had to be determined by rotating metaphors, while invention had to sustain the image, in order to give it continuity beyond the degeneration of any kind of ultimate goal. Therefore, his imagery can be seen as metaphors, arabesques, as the enfolding of a soul that was integrated with reality for a privilege conceded only to poetry. This privilege consists in being above the principle of any contradiction, stating that life has meaning, but is also absurd, helping you understand a mysterious image by using a paradox, just as a colour or a pencilled line can express both joy and desperation.

For the artist, pigments and creativity are the segments marking the various stages of his existence. Through his anecdotal painting and a sea of images that seem to germinate from hidden vibrations, Miró has given us an original interpretation of the world, reducing emotions out of all proportion compared with reality, to something like a dream to be lived within the mysterious space of an untranslatable script. It is as though his eye ran along the surface of the world at the speed of a spaceship and that everything seemed immensely impenetrable - as if he only had time to sketch a few rapid lines, with his hand moving like the pen on a seismograph that has gone out of control. Or, in a silent, nocturnal setting, it seems as though time has rolled down the stairs of the days; and, thinking of the past, he seems to linger on the doorstep of an unknown horizon in premeditated expectation, hoping that someone will put the strips of melancholy at the corners of the world into some kind of order.

Man Ray: 1890–1976, Ronny von de Velde, Antwerp 1994, no. 442 with illustration

Andrew Strauss and Timothy Baum of the Man Ray Expertise Committee have confirmed the authenticity of this work under the reference number 00421-P-2024 and that this work will be included in the Catalogue of Paintings of Man Ray, currently in preparation.

Surrealism-as it had been before the war-was no longer King. Surrealist ideology had been superseded by Existentialism (Jean-Paul Sartre now commanded the most attention, not André Breton). And in the art world a source of bewilderment for Man Ray and various others in his group, Surrealist imagery suddenly took a back seat to Abstraction.

"I sought a new technique that would be more automatic as when a seed of a sapling is planted and the forces of nature are counted on to do the rest."

Literature:

F. Arcangeli (ed.), Graham Sutherland, F. Ili Fabbri Editore, Milan, 1973, no. 138, with ill.

Serenity is, for Sutherland, only apparent or short-lived; he himself soon discovers that beneath the outward appearance of a nature so full of sounds and colours that it might show off his own joie de vivre, lies a tough struggle for survival. Plants and animals alike are equipped with instruments of offence and defence; they protect themselves with a kind of armour, often made of hard scales, they take on a ferocious appearance or arm themselves with spikes and quills.

These observations gave rise to his gigantic insects, such as Mantis of 1953 (...) creatures that belong to the animal world but that his anthropomorphic vision transforms into hybrids, suspended between human, vegetable, animal and mechanical dimension, metamorphic forms of universal life, a 'bestiary' that reminds us of the immense vitality of a nature we will not escape. Rovereto, 88<sup>ma</sup> Mostra Depero, Pittura e Arte Applicata, Sala Filarmonica, 11 August – 11 September 1951, exh. cat. no. 9, titled „Strappo di Vento“

Depero produced 'Colpo di vento', a beautiful painting in violet tones, during his second American sojourn from 1947 to 1949. He donated the work to William Hillman, President Truman's secretary. Depero was a guest at Hillman's country cottage in Marry Hall, Connecticut for over a year, from April 1948 to September 1949. This subject, namely the "blow of wind" that dishevelled his clothes, was replicated by Depero several times, as early as 1948 (this painting) and then in 1949 and again until 1952 (now at the Depero Museum). It is a work that recalls one of the main themes of Futurism, 'simultaneity', here made explicit in the multiplication of legs that renders the sense of movement.

Note:

It was above all in the years 1937 to 1941 that Grosz partly concentrated his work on the female nude and erotic subjects again, executing them in pencil, pen and ink, charcoal and mixed media. As mostly always his wife Eva, like in this very work, posed for him in the studio but also in nature, mostly in Cape Cod, the fashionable summer resort Grosz started to attend in 1938, spending there two or three months every year, where also this very work was executed in 1940.

Nürnberg, Galerie Würthle, „Wien um 1900, 1995, catalogue with ill. (without the second hand) and dated 1914

In Buchner-Kopper's dissertation, the painting “Marionetten” (“Puppets”) is illustrated three times, whereby the last illustration from the Nuremberg catalog of 1995 is listed as a separate version. However, this is a reworking of the first version, probably from around 1914 as dated in the catalog, in which the second hand on the tapestry was painted over by the artist.

We are grateful to Dr. Hansjörg Krug for his help in cataloguing this work.

In 1907 and 1910, Maximilian Lenz exhibited at the Secession Vienna together with his long-time student Ida Kupelwieser. In addition to landscapes and flower pictures, the picture “Marionetten” stood out with its complex, quite erotic symbolism. A theme that he will repeat several times, as he did in 1914.

It is assumed that the lying beauty is Ida Kupelwieser, who was for a long time unattainable for a love affair or a close liaison for the painter due to her social position as a wealthy entrepreneur's daughter. The picture can therefore be interpreted as a dream of the painter, who depicts himself on the lower right as a fool, the only figure not hanging by a thread, who watches longingly as the beauty extends her hand to the prince doll. Only years later, in 1926, he would marry Ida just a few months before her death and would finally become the “prince”. (Buchner-Kopper, 2001, p. 134)

We are grateful to Dr. Cornelia Cabuk and Dr. Franz Smola, Belvedere for confirming the authenticity of this work and for the inclusion of the painting in the catalog raisonné under the no. GE 456 A.

In 1930, Carl Moll painted a series of floral still-lives under the influence of his younger colleague Robin Christian Andersen, one of which, “Still Life with Blue Bottle”, was acquired by the Belvedere. Like this one, the “Begonia” in the Klement Collection shows a new boldness of color and a different orchestration of light, which, emerging more from the back, dancing along the edges, gives the objects a certain plasticity, a powerful presence.

1937 State Prize - First public recognition in Linz

The year 1937 brought a decisive turning point for Fritz Fröhlich. He had just joined the Upper Austrian Art Association on the advice of Hermann Ubell, the then director of the Upper Austrian State Museum, and that very year the major exhibition „Austrian Contemporary Art” in Linz’s Südbahnhalle gave him the opportunity to exhibit ten of his own works in two booths. Not only did he sell four works straight away, but at the age of just 27 he was also awarded one of two state prizes offered by the Ministry of Education. This first professional artistic recognition was accompanied by developments in Fröhlich’s private life, as he met his future wife (the teacher Beatrix Weißgärber) that same year. Many of the young Fritz Fröhlich’s artistic works perished in a fire a year later, when the little house built in 1937 in Dürnberg near Ottensheim was destroyed by a chimney fire.

The exhibition venue was a huge, badly dilapidated exhibition hall known as the Südbahnhalle, which was also used to exhibit prize cattle. Despite this uninviting atmosphere, all of Austria’s renowned artists’ organisations registered to take part in the exhibition. I was allowed to hang my pictures in two booths. The exhibition was generally regarded as sensationally successful. The Ministry of Education had offered two state prizes; the second was awarded to me, a 27-year-old newcomer.

Alle Adam-Bilder sind Spiegelbilder. Sie wurden mit Hilfe eines Spiegels gemalt und wollen wie ein Spiegel benützt werden.

Obwohl alle Adam-Bilder die Gesichtszüge des Rudolf Hausner tragen, ist ihre Verwendbarkeit zur Selbsterfahrung nicht auf ihn allein beschränkt, vielmehr sind alle dargestellten Adam-Situationen durchaus allgemeiner Natur. Durch die Unmittelbarkeit der exakten Berichterstattung ließ sich die physiognomische Eigenart des beobachteten Individuums nicht vermeiden. Die generelle Anwendbarkeit der gewonnenen Erfahrung wird dadurch jedoch nicht beeinträchtigt.

Rudolf Hauser

aus dem unten angeführten Katalog

All the Adam paintings are mirror images. They were painted with the help of a mirror and are intended to be used like a mirror.

Although all the Adam pictures bear the facial features of Rudolf Hausner, their application for self-awareness is not limited to him alone; on the contrary, all the Adam situations depicted are quite general in nature. The immediacy of the exact depiction meant that the physiognomic characteristics of the individual observed could not be avoided. However, this does not affect the general applicability of the experience gained.

We thank Mrs. Timna Brauer for her help

Meine Kunst blieb im Laufe meines Lebens in ihrem Wesen unverändert. Ich bringe nichts „Neues“. Und dies ist auch gar nicht meine Absicht. Andere Bilder - andere Maler. Mein Bestreben ist es vielmehr, eine Sache, eine Ansicht, zu einer Einsicht zu vertiefen und somit zu verbessern. Die Malerei, wie ich sie betreibe, enthält so viele Aspekte, ist so kompliziert und so „unerlernbar“, daß es auch heute noch vorkommen mag, daß ich des Nachts nicht einschlafen kann, so aufgeregt erwarte ich den kommenden „Maltag“.

Arik Brauer

The essence of my art has remained unchanged throughout my lifetime. I'm not doing anything "new". And this has never been my intention. That is something for other pictures, other painters. Rather, my endeavor is to provide a deeper perspective on something, a view, an insight and by doing so my aim is to improve it. Painting, as I do it, contains so many dimensions, it is so complicated and so "unlearnable" that even today I find I can't fall asleep at night, as I am so eagerly awaiting the coming "day of painting".
